Mariam and Omar enter a small gallery after school. They want to participate in its art fair. A young artist asks them to make an original work about their town. They are excited because they both love making things.

Mariam has a clear vision: a sculpture of a tree beside the river. Omar suggests shiny metal leaves and smooth stones. They choose these materials because the different surfaces will make the tree interesting to touch.

In the studio, they experiment with paper and wood. Their first tree falls over, but they do not stop. Although the task is difficult, their imagination helps them find a new plan. They make a wider base, so the tree stands up safely.

Omar wants an interactive tree. Visitors can turn its paper leaves to discover hidden messages about kindness. Mariam thinks this innovative idea will help everyone engage with their artwork. A leaf says, 'A small kind action can change a day.'

A friendly sculptor visits the studio. She shows them how to sculpt a small bird from clay. She says a bird can be a symbol of hope. Mariam places it on the tree because she wants their work to share a hopeful message.

The children also add pictures of local traditions. One shows a peasant caring for a field, and another celebrates agriculture near the river. Although the pictures are simple, they keep important stories alive. The children write a short article explaining their choices.

On the day of the fair, the exhibit looks attractive and lively. Visitors turn the leaves and read the messages. One parent feels emotional because the picture of the field reminds him of his family. He calls the children's work powerful.

The gallery thanks the children for helping promote creativity. They receive recognition, but the best reward is seeing people smile. Their tree is valuable because it brings people together. 'I will definitely make more art,' says Mariam. Omar agrees: ordinary things can carry incredible ideas.
